The crane company parked the crane in front last night and we moved our cars out of the way last night. This morning they showed up around 0830 and we signed the paperwork for the tree removal from the roof. The man remarked we were their only customer who had moved their cars in advance, normally they have to wait for people to scramble in a panic to do so. Duh.

They were done by 2pm. The house shook a few times as the weight was lifted off the house. The weight was so bad the door entrance from the living room to the hall to our bedroom was starting to bend (noted by insurance adjustor). I can go into more detail later. We have had internet for less than 24 hours so trying to get email to work etc and then to get photos off my phone to document the continuing damage as the trees are removed.

Now we hope it does not rain before the contractor can come and put some 1 x 4s up to frame out the holes so there is something to connect the tarp to.

I'll go over the process later. Bottom line IF all things go well and IF materials can be obtained THEN we might be done by April.

BEAUTIFUL trees taken from the roof.

This is taken from our attic (below).
